America's Debt Crisis: A Call to Action as National Debt Surpasses $37 Trillion

In the midst of all the political events of the past couple of weeks was buried a catastrophic milestone that threatens the future of our country.

On February 19, 2009, Rick Santelli's fiery outburst on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange ignited a spark that became a nationwide roar. From the trading floor, he channeled the anger of millions of Americans—taxed to the breaking point, watching helplessly as the federal debt spiraled out of control. Santelli's call birthed a movement – the TEA Party with its focus on stopping the bankrupting of our country.

In 2009, the national debt stood at $11.9 trillion. A staggering figure, yet a shadow of where we stand today. Last month we marked a grim milestone when the U.S. national debt leapt past $37 trillion. This is not just a number—it's a ticking time bomb threatening our economic future. We cannot print money forever. We cannot borrow without limit. We cannot ignore the crushing weight of interest payments that suffocate our prosperity.

Politicians of both parties have failed us and have actually increased the rate of crushing debt. At some point we must embrace the principles of fiscal responsibility, limited government and free markets. These are not relics of the past—they are the roadmap to reclaiming America's strength. The day is coming when the debt can no longer be ignored.
